I'm not sure about the release of version 2.5.0 yet (Spoonify is an open source project, so there is a chance that the versions have been released but I don't know about it yet), but the problem is solved for the moment. Some devices have several input/output peripheral connections which operate at the same time. In many cases, it is desirable that these connections share a single pin. Unfortunately, if each peripheral is on its own control line, signals which pass through it do not share a common voltage level. This can create a problem because signal levels may be affected by the next connections. One known solution is to attach a multiplexer to each signal so that only one device's output is connected to the pin. The multiplexer insures that all devices' connections are on the pin at the same time. In one example, a 4-bit binary coded decimal (BCD) multiplexer is built of a column-wise and row-wise array of n-channel metal-oxide semiconductor (NMOS) and p-channel metal-oxide semiconductor (PMOS) transistors.
